Korean movies always knows best to tug at their audience's heartstrings. Whether it's family drama, life problems, or just full blown tearjerkers. Korean movies is also home to some of the most terrifying, spine-chilling, and effective jumpscare usage in horror movies of all time. This movie captures both aspects successfully. The scoring in this movie is just right, and the visuals provided with each shot is definitely jaw-dropping.

The movie does lack in several aspects, such as inexplicable plot points, questionable decisions by the characters, and some lagging in storytelling by the latter half of the movie. Good thing is, the negative aspects are only apparent on subsequent watches, and the movie still provides good entertainment sprinkled with logical backstories and likable/unpleasant characters for you to root to survive or die.

All in all, Train to Busan is an exhilarating experience, and a fresh take on zombie movie tropes. words cannot describe how bad this film is, however numbers can. i rate this film 1/10 as it one of the cheesiest, dumb and stereotypical zombie films I've ever seen full with stupid tropes that provide nothing for the plot and only serve to extend the run time and entertain people with no sense of real intelligence. but it is fun to make fun of. The key to the fun is that Yeon eschews lookie-loo gore for thrilling set pieces: his fleet, imaginative action scenes recall Brad Bird's crisp transition to real people in peril when he made his "Mission Impossible" movie. a5c7b9f00b
